Abstract

The dissertation analyses the question “how can reason reflect on itself?” in the medieval interpretations of Aristotle’s De anima. It provides an overview over the included Latin commentator’s philosophical arguments concerning intellectual self-reflection and the development of the problem from antiquity until the Middle Ages. It also presents methods for qualitative and quantitative interpretation of text networks that have not previously been applied within the subject.